CLASS POEM

Plans are rushing through our minds making us grow up so fast.
It's all so terribly chaotic and things are flying past.

Not much time to think about what we're doing.
Just going through the motions of time while we're growing.

It'll soon be over when graduation has slapped us in the face.
Life will just be starting but it will slow down the pace.

We'll make up a slow-
motion instant replay, to figure out how things were yesterday.

And we'll suddenly have to recognize that its all seen so clearly through our parent's eyes.

They haven't seen us function through our days at school, but have slowly seen us learning how to set up our own rules.

Watching others play their roles and put up all the big fronts, teaches us to know which are real and which are only stunts.

We each have our own set of values and we each know wrong from right, but we've all done some foolish things which don't seem to have been too bright.

But these foolish things are what we refer to as childhood.
We'd all, sometime, like to go back if only... if only... we could.

We know that time won't stand still or race back to when we were kids.
But the race goes on to be grown up and laugh at the things we did.

The band goes on to play the last song we hear and sensitive one's will shed their tears.

It isn't really unhappiness that is meant by these tears, but I think it's sorrow, or better yet, maybe even fear.

Fear of being out there to do things for ourselves and no one will be there anymore to put us back on our shelves.

We'll all be happy
when we're out of here, and we're sure Mr. Formsma will jump with cheer.

So onward we go
marching like soldiers, carrying responsibilities of adults on our shoulders.
